Navigating Healthcare

Your Healthcare Real Estate Partner

The landscape

When it comes to healthcare, there is only one true constant — change. From patient experience and insurance structure to profitability and everything in-between, the healthcare industry is evolving. Consumerization and consolidation are the driving forces behind this evolution and it's redefining the landscape of healthcare real estate.

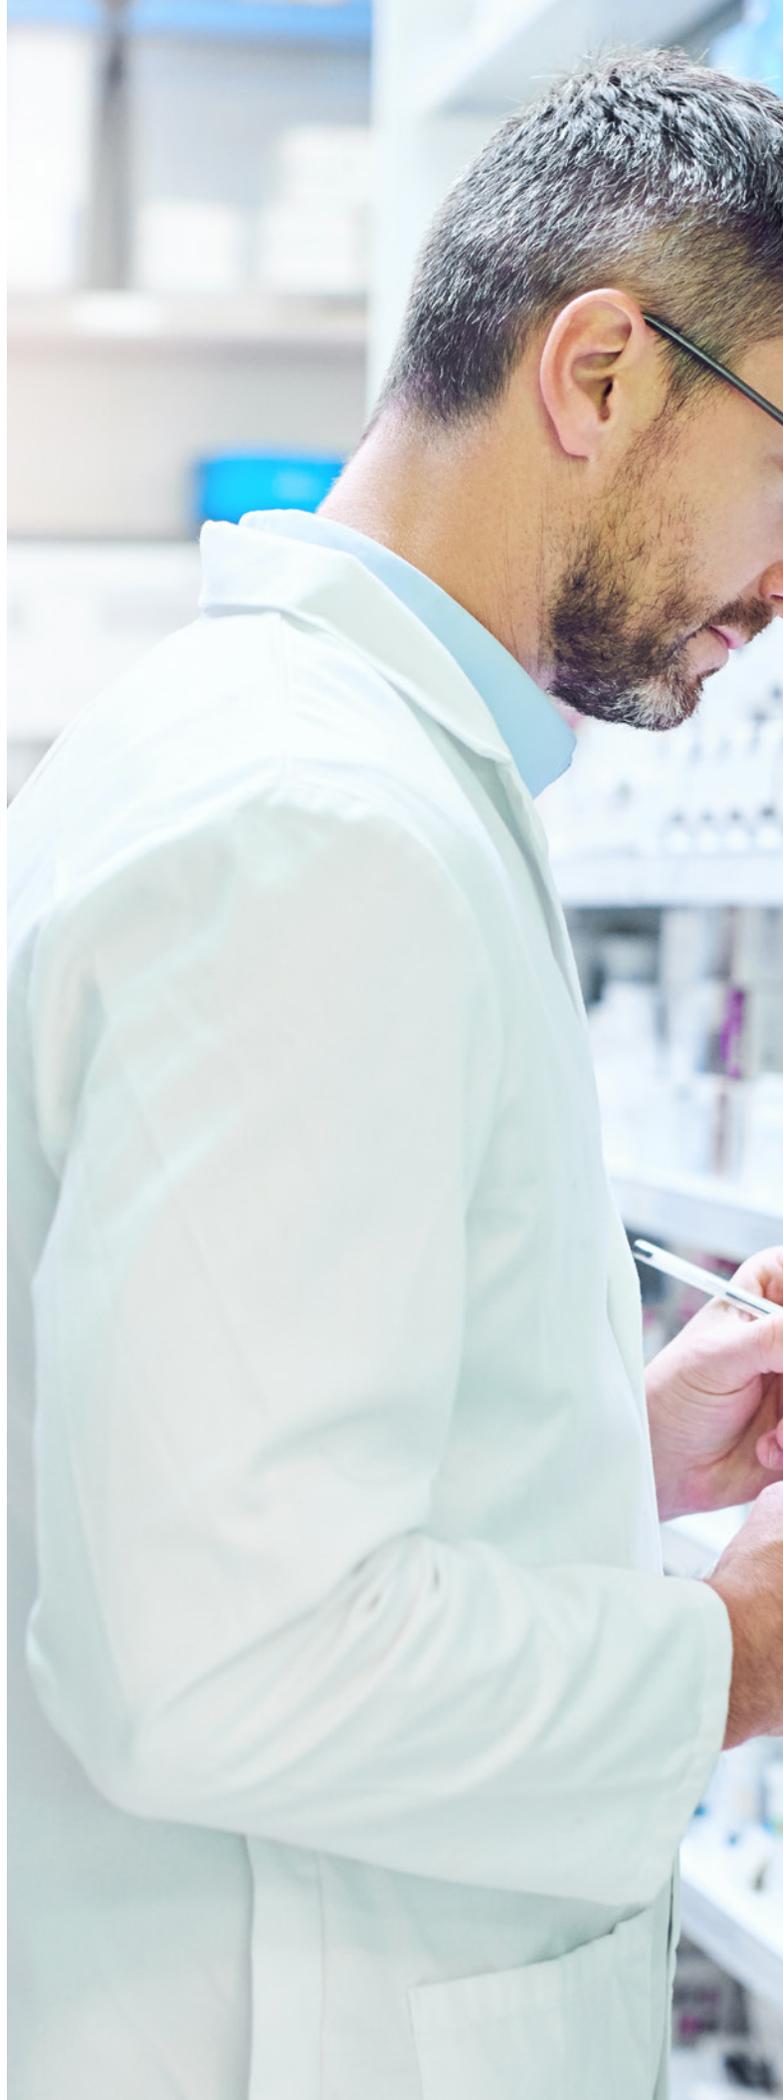

Patients are now consumers — and they're more informed than ever. Not only do they expect more from their physicians and health systems, they demand it. Advances in technology and the increasing adoption of telehealth are also shaking things up — from how and where surgery is delivered to how consumers interact with providers. Continuing the pattern of industry disruption is the mega-merger of major health systems which is consolidating bargaining power.

In today's consumer-driven society health systems must evolve — or be left behind. Navigating these changes can be challenging. Colliers is here to help.

The outlook

Consumerization, consolidation and technology all have an impact on where healthcare is headed. Consumer demand for flexibility and convenience suggests that newer, better-located ambulatory care facilities should continue to generate stronger returns than older properties. And the shift from in-patient to out-patient care delivery will fuel this growth.

Local, regional and mega-mergers will continue to transform the nature of service delivery, with the largest providers seizing even greater market share. At the same time, we'll see more collaboration between healthcare systems, further growth of employer-sponsored insurance and the emergence of consolidation among independent providers.

Patient care needs will also evolve as the population ages and relies more heavily on Medicare and Medicaid. Patient empowerment is expected to increase thanks to further advances in technology. And with new technologies focused on monitoring, research and healthcare availability, patients will take a more active role in their care.

Health systems must evolve — or be left behind.
